

Edd Carr

Edd Carr is an experimental artist from North Yorkshire, UK, working primarily with moving image and alternative processes to explore our anxieties around the ecological crisis and the mass extinction of life. He manipulates his own experiences to understand wider societal trauma surrounding the climate crisis - particularly within his own generation. His most recent work, YORKSHIRE DIRT, is printed entirely on soil using a unique process he innovated.

Edd's moving image work has been exhibited worldwide, including Holland, Australia, Germany, and the UK. He has won multiple awards for his sustainable animation techniques, including most recently the Channel 4 Random Acts Award. He also hand-printed the first cyanotype music video for Tycho Jones, which has been nominated for the UK Music Video Awards, alongside videos from artists including Liam Gallagher, Disclosure, Dua Lipa, and Little Mix.

Edd has also had his undergraduate and postgraduate theses published by their respective universities, and has given public talks on each subject - both concerning sustainability in art. Having recently completed an MA at the Royal College of Art, he currently receives funding from East Street Arts to continue his work on sustainable photography.
